Yearly or multiyear events

- Monthly contest, WikiProject Military history. The contest department of the Military History WikiProject aims to encourage editors to improve the quality of articles relating to military history and to recognize the most outstanding improvements to them. The primary contest available is a whole-voting competition that awards points for improving articles. The contest runs from 1 January to 31 December.
- Event of Iraq Wikiproj. Wine. The September 2020 tasting drive is a one-month-long effort by the Guild of Copy Editors to improve articles related to wine. Participants will receive awards for their efforts. The drive will run from 1 September 2020 through September 30 (inclusive). Ground rules (general, scoring, and tasting), and their collection, and those listed on the GOCE drive page, will be in effect during the drive. Please sign up and start editing on 25 September 2020 (UTC).

Cyclones for editors

- The Wikipedia:Cyclone/Logs page has been simplified as part of ongoing work to modernize the account creation interface. The graph showing project statistics no longer appears next to the form or showing wiki-wide data. Multiple account creation experiments show that a simpler form helps newcomers complete registration. [1]
- The Wikipedia:Cyclone/Logs page has been updated to show the IP address of the user who has been given an alert, and will now sort in reader order (order in the part of the page, which may affect some images/avatar names). [2] [3]
- There are 42 communication templates that were recorded last week. For example, an issue where image thumbnails are not displayed correctly in Internet Explorer 11 was fixed. Cyclones for technical contributors

- Inline info card is a feature that helps patrollers see information about user accounts. So far, it has been available only to those who are part of a user experiment group and wasn't changed. Now, it's available to users in the Cyclone beta test group. Members of this group can see the inline info card when they hover their mouse over the username of a user.
